1. The number of Cominformists in the Communist Party of Yugoslavia following the break with the Soviets was probably about 30 per cent of the total membership. For the most part these were "hard core" Communists who believed that Communism could not maintain itself without an alliance with the USSR. At the same time, not all of these persons were actually opposed to Tito personally.
2. These Cominformists who were actually imprisoned after the break were obliged to attend "re-education courses" and special lectures during their confinement. Prior to their release they were forced to sign a written statement to the effect that they had renounced the Cominform. In some instances, Yugoslav enterprises received orders from UDB not to hire released Cominformists without prior approval of UDB.
3. Of the imprisoned Cominformists, ex-Finance Minister Svetozar Kujovic is the only one who ever obtained a responsible position thereafter, and he was shortly released from his job and retired on a pension. Released Cominformists have never been readmitted to the Party, and the most important positions they can now aspire to are those within the city and district committees. However, they do exert some influence in Party circles.
4. It is probable that most Yugoslav Cominformists are loyal to Tito personally, but their attitude towards other ranking Yugoslav officials is not known. It is doubtful that they are well enough organized to have their own leader, especially since UDB keeps a special file on all persons known to have pro-Cominform tendencies.
